guarded by them. No respectable jeweller attempts to pass off paste as diamonds. Swindlers may sometimes buy fine specimens from the dealers and trade them away at the regular diamond price; but such cases must be rare, for any person of the least common sense, who thought of purchasing a diamond from an individual not in the trade, would be sure to consult a jeweler or other expert in precious stones, by whom the fraud would be detected in an instant. No paste can stand all the tests of the diamond. Its warmth to the touch, its retention of moisture, the ease with which it can be scratched by agate or tepaz, the minute air-bubbles which a microscope discovers in its depths, all prove it is an imitation. But the skillful eye can tell the real diamond from the false at a glance. The former has a hardness of lustre, a cold glitter of refracted light, which the finest pastes just miss. None but the most experienced judges can retain a memory of the icy lambency or adamantine splendor of the gennine gem, so that they can always apply it as Ordinary judges will be deceived by the improved pastes; and any lady, who might be expected from the richness of her attire to wear diamonds, may swing out the pastes from her ears, or display them on her fingers, without fear of detection, till the brightness of the imitation has departed; for it goes sooner or later, with the most careful usage. The permanent lustre of crystalized carbon is its one precious wholly inimitable quality. This permanence or stability, it may be remarked, characterizes all the precious things of nature, gold, silver, ivory, and every one of the gems. Imitations. which are almost perfect in other respects, fail in that. It is nature's last, impassable barrier So far with the paste manufacturers.

A more interesting branch of the subject is the chemical, or strictly scientific production of diamonds from their native material carbon Some of the first chemists in the world have devoted years of toil to this task, without success. Microscopic diamonds have been made or are reported to have been. Becquerel, a French chemist, produced minute crystalizations having the hardness of diamonds, by the slow action of electricity on box-wood charcoal (a very pure form of carbon,) but they were nearly black. Another Frenchman last year claimed to have made diamonds, by the reaction of phosphorus on sulphide of carbon, both being under water. The sulphide of car-bon dissolved the phosphorus, and the latter, it was said, slowly combined with the sulphur, freeing the carbon which crystalized out. Nobody ever saw the diamonds-but the maker. Many experiments have been made with this remarkable fluid (sulphide of carbon.) and from it, if from any source, the artificial diamonds must come.

It consists of pure sulphur and pure carbon, in the proportions of about five of the former to one of the latter. The carbon ingredient is, in fact, diamonds in a state of fluidity, pos-sessing the wonderful refractive power of the real gems. The exceeding brilliancy of the sulphide of carbon adapts it peculiarly for use in prisms, for spectral analysis-that new department of modern science by which some of the most extraordinary discoveries of the age have been made. Now, if it were possible to isolate the carbon and let it crystalize out, diamonds could be made. Ordinary attempts to decompose the fluid by electricity, give a deposit of sulphur on one pole, and of black charcoal in small grains, on the other. Silver has a powerful affinity for sulphur; and an English chemist tried the effect of immersing that metal in the fluid, hoping to separate the carbon in that way, but nothing came of it after ten years' experimenting, the present year, an entirely new process of making diamonds directly from charcoal, by the action of borax, which he claims dissolves the carbon at a high heat, yielding one pound of brilliants of the first water per bushel of charcoal. It is further said that a patent for this process has been taken out by the inventor for the United States, as well as for all other countries where "sparklers" are in request Such are the extraordinary "yarns" to which scientific journals sometimes give currency, probably for the fun of the thing, since the editors must know that nothing can be more absord than the alleged discovery. It is not quite safe to predict what science will not do; but this much may be said, that the prospect of making diamonds artificially from carbon, except in Nature's secret and awful laboratory of the ages, is about as flatter-ing as that of the discovery of the "philosopher's stone."-New York Journal of Commerce.

A French chemist has brought out, during
